During the time that _____Place_____ was divided into provinces (or dukedoms as they were called) there reigned in one of these provinces was a _____Adjective_____, who had deposed and banished his elder brother, the lawful duke.

The _____Noun_____, who was thus driven from dominions, retired with a few faithful _____Noun - Plural_____ to the forest of _____Noun_____; and here the good duke lived with his loving _____Noun - Plural_____, who had put themselves into a voluntary exile for his sake, while their land and revenues enriched the _____Adjective_____ usurper; and custom soon made the life of careless ease they led here more sweet to them than the pomp and uneasy splendour of courtier's life. Here they lived like the old Robin Hood of England, and and to this forest many noble youths daily resorted from the court, and did fleet the time carelessly, as they did who lived in the golden age, In the summer they lay along Under the fine shade of the large forests trees, marking playful sports of wild deer; and so fond were they of these poor dappled fools, who seemed to be the native inhabitants of the forest, that it grieved them to be forced to kill them to supply themselves with venison for there food. the the cold winds of winter made the duke feel the change of his adverse future, he would endure it passionately and say: these chilling winds which blow upon my body are true counsellors; they do not flatter, but represent truly to make my condition; and though they bite sharply, pot
