Friends

Friends was an Adjective TV show centered around the idea of watching a group of Plural noun who are supposedly friends. Nobody was captivated by this show except for 16-year-old Plural noun and there was truly a feeling in every Plural noun heart when it finished.

Its target audience was Plural noun but it soon spread to the rest of the population like a viral Noun does in our days. In other words, you can liken it to the spread of Noun flu.

This American sitcom became astoundingly popular despite a flimsy pretense and a seeming lack of any Verb ending in ing talent. Intrinsic to the Adjective nature of the show are the Adjective people in it. Case in point: Joey, a character who, if he had really been as stupid as is made out, would have had trouble standing unaided, let alone speaking or indeed Verb ending in ing how you were Verb ending in ing.

After 10 seasons in which the actors were paid more than the combined GDP of several African Plural noun somebody out there mercifully decided to end it. Not a moment too soon, either, given that the characters had become sickening Plural noun of personalities completely unfunny to start with, demonstrated in the Adjective; character of Phoebe. It's astounding that she made it through 10 seasons without someone Verb ending in ing her to death with half a Noun.

Potentially

the most annoying type of person in the world is the type who wonders: "Why isn't my _____Noun like an episode of Friends, and why don't I have wacky friends who come around to instigate crazy adventures?"; The answer is simple: Assuming you have any friends left after the _____Adjective _____Noun misadventure, then they are likely as _____Adjective and _____Adjective as you. The reason you never have "wacky"; adventures is because you and all your friends are _____Adjective fucks who spend the vast majority of your time _____Verb ending in ing _____Adjective _____Plural noun eating Wotsits and _____Verb ending in ing so aggressively that everyone is surprised your _____Noun is still attached, let alone functioning.

Unbelievably, the characters spend the vast amount of their time in a _____Noun house. Hard to believe, given that if any normal _____Noun had to spend that amount of time with _____Plural noun that _____Adjective they would undoubtedly want to be somewhere, anywhere that sells _____Noun. It's suspected that the show played no part in Matthew Perry's _____Verb ending in ing _____Noun addiction, but you would certainly want to be ripped out of your skull if you had to _____Verb to David Schwimmer _____Verb for any longer than 2 minutes. You can almost see small pieces of his _____Noun slipping away as he makes another "hilarious"; Chandler sarcastic comment "joke", his place as the _____Adjective one hopefully being an ironic _____Noun.
