I use my computer everyday and my goals for the future are actually not possible without ICT skills, since I have refined my career pathway to 'Graphic Design'. I recently attended an university open day and was told that every graphic design student must own a MacBook, Adobe CS5 as well as have internet connection; and this isn't a one off. Some university courses can now be completed online! This is such a phenomenon, although I must admit that I would always choose actual classroom over virtual classroom on the basis that I love to be around people.

Reading my original article also renewed my appreciation for being given the opportunity to participate in the large international project that educated teenagers about the many considerations when using the internet. If it wasn't for this programme then I wouldn't have met the great people I did, and develop an understanding about the Verb - Past Tense of ICT in communities, and I definitely would still be taking technology for granted. I really hope that such fantastic programs are still implemented in schools in years to come as I have witnessed first hand how important they are in preparing students for the future, a future that will definitely see a growing dependence on ICT.
