Haunted House

Many people around the country go to haunted houses on Halloween. Whether you plan to or it's an ______ decision, you know the ______ of the night will be fear. So you, the _______ decide to fight your fear in an internal _______.

You arrive at the door and see a pumpkin, which is a Noun of Halloween. This isn't to scary, but the fear is yet to Verb. So, you decide to walk inside. Adverb, you walk inside and see the Adjective spider webs hanging from the ceiling. From your point of Noun, this really isn't Adjective at all.

You walk forward more confidently now. All of a sudden, a vampire pops out from the wall, its fangs dripping red blood. You let out an Adjustive Noun before realizing that it's fake and keep moving. If this is the Noun to the haunted house, it's really not that bad! So you stride forward, not scared of the werewolf that howled in your face, the crazy axe man that jumped up behind you, or even the monsters that keep trying to rip your head off. You stop watching Adverb for anything, and it's not until a little girl with bright red eyes appears out of nowhere that you get terrified and dash from the house as fast as possible. And so, from that Halloween on, you realized that the Noun of the whole holiday is to scare and to be scared, and so you gave up on your internal conflict of your fear of those haunted houses and just had a good time handing out candy for the rest of your days.
