A Day of Fun

A storm swept through my little old town called Winston-Salem on April 12, 2012. It was a tornado to be exact, and it was powerful. There were some heavy winds that swept through the streets that picked up some _____ Adjective roofs on the way. I ran to a ditch to _____ verb myself, but it didn't do any justice. I was lifted into the air and couldn't believe my eyes.

Once they opened I couldn't help but _____ verb in fear to the sight of being lifted into the air. I had several _____ Noun because of my careless squirming against many _____ Adjective roofs and other things ripped off of several homes. I saw that the storm was approaching a mountain top and formed myself into a position to _____ verb myself from any other unnecessary injuries. As the storm swept by the mountains the winds kind of let up and split into different directions. I _____ verb to the ground safely without any injuries. I looked around with a _____ Adjective look because I had no idea where I was and what to do next. I tried to _____ verb from breaking down and crying like a baby, but I couldn't hold back. I was lost in the mountains somewhere far away from my little town; at that point I needed a little _____ verb to get me back on my feet to get myself home. I walked and walked until my feet felt like needles were sticking me in them. I finally saw a sign directing me towards home. At this rate I'm dragging myself down the long street that eventually leads to my house; I heard a voice that sound like my mothers. The sound got louder and louder and finally I looked up and felt a soft touch. At last, I was home.
