

China and Obama

1. Noun
2. Noun
3. Noun
4. Noun
5. Noun
6. Noun
7. Noun
8. Noun
9. Noun
10. Noun - Plural
11. Noun
12. Noun - Plural
13. Noun - Plural
14. Noun
15. Noun
16. Noun - Plural
17. Noun
18. Noun
19. Noun
20. Noun

China and Obama

PRESIDENT XI: (As interpreted.) In the first _____ Noun that I've had with President Obama this afternoon, we had an in-depth, sincere and candid _____ Noun on the domestic and foreign policies of China and the United States, on our joint work to build a new model of major country _____ Noun, and our international and regional issues of mutual interest. And the President and I reached important _____ Noun on these issues.

I stated very clearly to President Obama that China will be firmly committed to the path of peaceful _____ Noun and China will be firm in deepening reform and opening up the country wider to the _____ Noun. China will work hard to realize the Chinese dream of the great national _____ Noun and will work hard to push forward the noble cause of peace and development for all _____ Noun.

By the Chinese dream, we seek to have economic prosperity, national renewal and people's well-being. The Chinese dream is about cooperation, _____ Noun, peace and win-win, and it is connected to the American Dream and the beautiful dreams people in other _____ Noun - Plural may have.

President Obama and I both believe that in the age of economic _____ Noun and facing the objective need of countries sticking together in the face of difficulties, China and the United States must find a new path -- one that is different from the inevitable confrontation and conflict between the major _____ Noun - Plural of the past. And that is to say the two sides must work together to build a new model of major country relationship based on mutual respect and win-win cooperation for the benefit of the Chinese and American Noun - Plural, and people elsewhere in the world.

The international community Noun to China and the United States to deliver this. When China and the United States work together, we can be an anchor for world stability and the propeller of world Noun.

I stand ready to work with President Obama to expand on all levels of Noun - Plural between the two sides. I look forward to maintaining close communication with the President through mutual Noun, bilateral meetings, exchange of letters and phone calls. And I invited President Obama to come to China at an appropriate time for a similar meeting like this. And we look forward to visiting each other Noun.

At the same time, the two sides will work hard to make Noun in the various bilateral mechanisms, such as the strategic and economic dialogue and the high-level consultation on people-to-people exchange. Also, the Chinese Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Chinese Minister of National Defense will both make visits to the United States within the Noun.