China and Obama

1.	Noun
2.	Noun
3.	Noun
4.	Noun
5.	Noun
6.	Noun
7.	Noun
8.	Noun
9.	Noun
10.	Noun - Plural
11.	Noun
12.	Noun - Plural
13.	Noun - Plural
14.	Noun
15.	Noun
	Noun - Plural
	Noun
	Noun
	Noun
	Noun

China and Obama

PRESIDENT XI: (As interpreted.) In the first that I've had with President Obama this afternoon, we had an in-depth, sincere and candid on the domestic and foreign policies of China and the United States, on our joint work to build a new model of major country, and our international and regional issues of mutual interest. And the President and I reached important on these issues.
I stated very clearly to President Obama that China will be firmly committed to the path of peaceful Noun and China will be firm in deepening reform and opening up the country wider to the Noun China will work hard to realize the Chinese dream of the great national and will work hard to push forward the noble cause of peace and development for all By the Chinese dream, we seek to have economic prosperity, national renewal and people's well-being. The Chinese dream is about cooperation,, peace and win-win, and it is connected to the American Dream and the beautiful dreams people in other may have.
President Obama and I both believe that in the age of economic and facing the objective need of countries sticking together in the face of difficulties, China and the United States must find a new path one that is different from the inevitable confrontation and conflict between the major Noun - Plural of the past.
And that is to say the two sides must work together to build a new model of major country relationship based on mutual respect and win-win cooperation for the benefit of the Chinese and American Noun - Plural, and people elsewhere in the world.

The international community to China and the United States to deliver this. When China and the United States work together, we can be an anchor for world stability and the propeller of world
I stand ready to work with President Obama to expand on all levels of between the two sides
. I look forward to maintaining close communication with the President through mutual, bilateral meetings, exchange of letters and phone calls. And I invited President Obama to come to China at an appropriate time for a similar meeting like this. And we look forward to visiting each other At the same time, the two sides will work hard to make in the various bilateral mechanisms, such as the strategic and economic dialogue and the high-level consultation on people-to-people exchange. Also, the Chinese Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Chinese Minister of National Defense will both make visits to the United States within the ©2024 WordBlanks.com · All Rights Reserved.