A Principal for a week....

Mr. Jenkins picked _____First Name of a Person_____ Wilde to be his student-principal of the month. Mr. Wilde isn't exactly what you would call _____Adjective_____, considering he was a _____school grade_____ grader.

The first thing Mr. Wilde did was hire a _____collective noun_____ of talented students to replace the teachers. He also replaced the lunch-ladies with _____compound noun- animal_____ (he hired them, but since they mostly hopped around in the food and ate it, they were not paid much money). The Janitor was replaced by an ape, which did more messing than it did cleaning. Mr. Wilde took the savings from the school and bought each class a _____concrete noun- a prize_____, which were _____collective noun_____ of _____concrete noun- animal_____ (Mr. Wilde was unusually fond of them). He also bought a swimming pool, and you could swim in the pool the size of a _____compound noun- a sport_____ field instead of playing on the _____concrete noun_____.

_____collective noun_____ of friends were allowed to be social during class, where all they learned were football plays and _____compound noun- a sport_____ rules. Sometimes they were allowed to display what they have learned by playing an occasional game . Of course, like I said, the student principal nomination only lasted a week, and yet Mr. Wilde was able to turn the school upside-down in just 5 short days.

When Mr. Jenkins returned a week later, he was shocked to see what a student could do to a school in just a short period of time. The school was _____abstract noun_____, and the _____abstract noun_____ outside smelled like chlorine. He nearly passed out when he walked in, and he learned a VERY _____Adjective_____ lesson: He was NEVER going to allow a student to become principal for a week again (mostly because it took him _____Number_____ months to undo the _____Adjective_____ mess that he had created).
