The Christmas Without Sarah

In 2013, no one could have ever _____ Verb - Past Participle that the Haughney family would have to go through the Holiday season without their _____ Adjective second/favorite child.

"Who is going to nag me to get _____ Noun for her?" the older daughter asked, sobbing in the corner whilst holding her _____ drink.

The mother and father stared out the window at the _____ Adverb _____ Adjective snow wondering how warm and _____ Adjective it must be in California this time of year.

The grandfather sat on the _____ Noun _____ Verb - Base Form the paper. Or maybe he was _____ Verb - Base Form _____ Form the paper, he might've been _____ Verb - Base Form.

The future son-in-law, new to the fold, _____ Verb - Base Form the movie selections in the home and noted that they must all be films that the second daughter had left behind.

The dog, so _____ Adjective and _____ Adjective, _____ Verb - Base Form around the house, begging for scraps of _____ food. _____ food, _____ food _____ food that _____ Adjective dog wanted everything.

But

the day was young! A Adjective box from the United States Postal Service arrived at the house. Cliff Clavin delivered it after all, so it was absolutely magical.

Inside the box were Hannukah trinkets; they were 90% off at Target and thus only cost .75 cents for all three Adjective items. Trinkets and booze actually.

In California, the younger daughter holds a club card to a store called BevMo. They have cheap alcohol and give away free samples sometimes and even have something called a five cent wine sale. The daughter receives discounts on them all! She got that Disaronno for like...Adjective cents.

The rest of the package contained Noun - Plural and Noun - Plural for the family; all of them not well-written, but nonetheless thoughtful.

The family Skyped with their daughter while it was incredibly early in California. She was watching Cheers, wasting time on Youtube and thinking about food and food (as she always does).

They then surprised the second daughter with wonderful news! All five of them would be traveling to California in the near future to visit and go to Place.

"It is destined to be a great time!" the grandfather said.

"Yes, a great, great time," the parents agreed.

And then with a wink of her eye and a sip of Disaronno, the second daughter said, "Merry Christmas to all, and to all a good...afternoon? What time is it in Pennsylvania?"

THE END!
