Hamlet To Be Or Not To Be Madlib

The question for him was whether to continue to or not - whether it was more Adjective	_ to suffer the slings and of an unbearable situation, or to declare war on the sea of troubles the	ıat afflict one, and by opposing them, end them. To die. He the prospect. To sleep - as sim	ıple as that. And with that sleep we end the and the thousand natural that human beings have to endure. It's an end that we would all ardently hope for. To die. To sleep. To sleep. Perh	aps to Yes, that was the, because in that sleep of death the dreams we might have when we have shed this Moun must make us pause. That's the consideration that creates the calamity of such a long Because, who would tolerate the whips and scorns of time	; the tyrant's offences against us; the contempt of proud; the pain of rejected love; the insolence of officious; and the advantage that the worst people take of the best, when one coul	d just release oneself with a blade? Who would carry this load, sweating and grunting under the	he burden of a life if it weren't for the dread of the after life - that unexplored country from who	ose border no returns? That's the thing that confounds us and makes us put up with those evils that	i we know rather than hurry to others that we don't know about. So thinking about it makes of	us all, and it follows that the first impulse to end our life is obscured by on it. And great	t and important Noun - Plural are diluted to the point where we don't do anything.
