Forlorn Hope

Anna's thoughts were of a happier time as a Adjective Noun. She must have been four or five years old. Her father would take her to a local park and stand at the base of the Noun waiting to catch her in his Noun - Plural. It was one of her favorite Noun - Plural with her Noun. The first time she climbed the six feet to the top of the Noun she was frightened. She had Verb - Past Participle on her father's Noun - Plural before and they lived in a two-story Noun, but the Noun was higher than she had ever been without Noun or her father to keep her safe.

She believed in her father implicitly. Inspired by her father's Noun - Plural, she took the plunge. She felt the cold metal slide against her Noun - acceleration into those waiting Noun - Plural. The fear of the situation faded as she performed this daring feat of courage again and again. Squeals of Noun escaped her lips - her father grinned at the bottom, sometimes Verb - Present Tense with laughter. She knew she was safe cradled in his Noun - Plural or walking hand in hand back to the Noun. Life was Adjective - Comparative then - Daddy was there to Verb her.
