A smashing tale

One day, two children had a bet about a very Adjective part of the train station platform. One boy, Sam, said that there was no Noun at the end of the platform, but the other boy, Luke, insisted that there was.

There was not a boy as Adjective as Sam. Sam would often be very Adjective even about Adjective things. Once, Sam got so engrossed in a game of Board game that he ended up Verb - Present ends in ING Number family members while Verb - Present ends in ING backwards on a Noun. Anyway, Sam thought that the Adjective Noun thing was to Verb - Base Form and Verb - Base Form people who fell onto it, whereas Luke had actually researched into the object in question and knew that it was to stop Noun - Plural and Noun from Verb - Present ends in ING on the live rail. As I said before, Sam insisted there was not a Noun barring people from entering, but Like knew that there was.

"Right." Luke Verb - Past Tense. "The next time we pass it, you look at it and I'll prove you Adjective!"

One the way back home, there was a tension in the air so Adjective that even an Animal could skip across it. They reached the station in question and to Luke's utter Emotion, Sam Verb - Base Form his head straight through the Number inch glass window. Glass shattered and Number people were killed because glass cut their Part of Body. Luke got off lucky and only got a small bit of glass in his Part of Body, but Sam's face...My God. Blood was streaming from his orifices and Part of Body, but he felt no pain. No physical pain that is. Tears were _____ Verb - Present ends in ING from his _____ Part of Body

- "Wrong? WRONG? How could I be wrong?" he _____ Verb - Past Tense. Luke let out a _____ Noun and was given the Nobel peace prize for proving Sam wrong.

The end.
