Classroom presentation

After _____ Adjective back and forth emails with the teacher, the day has arrived. It's the day to teach grade 7 sexuality classes at _____ Proper Noun Public School. I have 3 groups to do with of course lunch break in between 2 of the groups.

First group, teacher didn't even tell kids I was coming. They have no clue what we are going to talk about.

Teacher can't even say the word sexuality with blushing. I'm hoping they at least received puberty teaching in elementary school. We start with ground rules. Of course none of the students answered, they are too busy trying to avoid eye contact with me. This is so much fun! I get the ball rolling with a simple one; there are no silly questions.

After the ground rules were posted on the white board I started to talk about STIs. I could see their worried faces , concern in their eyes. Some kids didn't make eye contact and others couldn't keep their eyes off me. I could feel some students not being comfortable with the topic. I gazed around the room and then it happened. I heard a loud crash. Kaboom. All of a sudden there was panic in the classroom
