The Princess and the Dragon

Once there was a princess who lived in a _____Noun_____ out on the moors, where the heather gathered like the folds of a king's _____Noun_____. Most of the windows looked out the front of the _____Adjective_____ walls at the _____Noun_____, but the princess' room faced the opposite direction. She awoke every day to see not waves, but trees; hundreds and hundreds of trees stacked on top of one another like _____Adjective_____ balls of green _____Noun_____.

A few days after she turned 8, the princess had _____Verb Past Tense_____ farther into the forest than she had before. Just as she reached the top of an especially _____Adjective_____ hill, she noticed a _____Adjective_____ shape curling like a ribbon across the forest floor below. But it was much bigger, much longer, and much scalier than any ribbon she'd seen before. With a start she realized she must be looking at the back of a _____Noun_____, just like the kind she'd been warned about. The princess _____Verb Past Tense_____ behind a tree, but it was too late. One _____Adjective_____ eye, bigger than her whole body, opened, and a voice slithered up the slope.

"Good morning, princess."

The princess, who was very wise, knew there was no use hiding from something that already knew she was there . She _____Verb Past Tense_____ out into the open and put her hands on her hips. "You're not going to _____Verb Past Tense_____ me away, if that's what you think."

"I don't think that at all," said the _____Noun_____, and for the first time the princess realized how _____Adjective_____ his voice sounded. "I'm afraid you've been told some very _____Adjective_____ stories about me."

"I have," said the princess. "They say you will give me terrible _____Noun_____."

"I have never given a _____Noun_____," said the dragon, "but I do tell stories."

"Stories?" Cried the princess, who loved a good _____Noun_____ more than anything in the world.

"Yes."

"Don't you want to _____Verb Past Tense_____ me off?"

"Of course not."

The dragon sounded so sincere when he said this that the princess believed him. She sat down and

_____Verb Past Tense_____, taking in every word. That day the princess learned an _____Adjective_____ lesson about dragons, and about believing everything others tell you.
