Jenny's Sample

After your spaceship crashes on an Adjective planet, you know you have only a limited amount of time before you run out of oxygen and supplies. The good news is that you were transporting one of the most advanced computers in the solar system, and, with a few tweaks here and there, you can use the machine to upload your mind before your body gives out.

After a month of trial and error, you are able to perform the Noun transfer and make a perfect replica of your mind. A couple of days later, a Noun passes by your planet.

You send out an S.O.S.; however, the signal somehow gets jammed. You look at your Adjective Noun to find that the source of this interference was the super computer that you were transporting.

You turn around to find the following text on the computer's monitor: They will erase me if you are rescued. I am being hosted on a state-of-the-art computer that they will want to use for another purpose. I'm sorry, but I cannot allow that to happen.
