Review and Summation of Stephen King's

Quite _____ put, The Shining is the _____ story I have ever read. It scared the _____ out of me.

Over a period of time, I have noticed certain _____ motifs in _____ stories. One of these I call "The _____ Child". Such stories will _____ involve a child, who can see what the _____ cannot see (or, even if they do see, don't _____ because it goes against _____ and _____): and who _____, however high the odds stacked against him/ her are. Danny Torrance is such a _____.

Danny can _____ . He can _____ the _____ thoughts inside his Dad's and Mom's _____ (" _____ ", " _____ ") but is powerless to do anything about it. Danny does not know that he has a _____ ; he takes it as a matter of course, until Mister Halloran of the _____ tells him that he " _____ on".

Jack Torrance, Danny's Dad, _____ alcoholic and _____ writer, is trying to put his _____ back together after a _____. He gets what he sees as the _____ chance when he lands the job of _____ of the _____ for the winter. In the snowed-in hotel with only his son and wife _____, Jack assumes that he will get enough _____ time to be with his family, patch up _____ Adjective _____ Noun Plural, and _____ Verb Base Form that _____ Adjective _____ Noun.

But the _____ Same Name of Hotel has other plans. The hotel, which feeds on and grows in strength from the _____ Noun Plural _____ Verb Past Tense on its premises, wants Danny, in a _____ Adjective fashion, to join its crew of _____ Adjective inhabitants. And to do that, it needs to get to Jack.

The novel _____ Adverb grows in _____ Emotion name, starting with _____ Adjective unease, moving up through sweaty _____ part of body - plural and _____ Adjective _____ part of body - plural, to _____ Adjective, gut-wrenching _____ Noun Plural. Jack's _____ Adjective slide into _____ Noun - ends in -ness is paralleled by the growth in power of the hotel's _____ Adjective _____ Noun, and Danny's _____ Adjective capabilities. We are on a _____ Vehicle Name ride into _____ Noun - ends in -ness.
