ope

It's the yo	Verb Base Form	, the water you swim in. It was the first word you can remember forming, crawling out yo	our mother's birth cana	al, apologizing. Ope. It was the first word you uttered to a human being earlier today, your	self, staring into the m	nirror, bemused. It was the second thing you said to another human being today, squeezing p	ast a sea of them on the	ne Red Line you barely even hear yourself say it. It's heard by no one. A businessman y	ou nearly groped grui	nts a half-acknowledgement, stepping to the left. He didn't hear what you said, but he und	derstood.
It's the noise you make a	t a funeral, the one yo	u make when you flirt. To this day, it's the only sound you make when you seed. It's in the	e look your late grand	ma gave you when talking about her kids: one of them a drug addict, the other a car sal	esman, the other your	dad. It exists between the silences in the elevator, it thrives in Verb Base Form	Verb Base Form . N	lot quite an apology, not quite a defense, not really much of a statement or conscious th	nought of anything at	all. More a reaction, more an unintended consequence, a shameful admission of where you'r	re from. Ope. An emp	ty signifier, it
