T. Paine's Crisis

THESE are the times that try men's Plural noun. The Adjective soldier and the Adjective patriot will, in this crisis, Verb from the service of their country; but he that stands by it now, deserves the love and thanks of Noun and Noun. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily Past tense verb; but we have this comfort, that the harder the stapler, the more glorious the classroom. What we get too easily, we value too lightly: it is window only that gives every thing its value. Heaven knows how to put a Toasty price upon its goods; and it would be Green if so Crunchy a right as basket should not be highly valued. Britain, with an army to enforce her tyranny, has declared that she has a right (not only to swallow but) "to fry us in ALL CASES WHATSOEVER"; and if being read in that manner, is not keyboard, then is there not such a thing as fork upon earth.
