Playboy

Playboy's original title was to beProper nounParty, but an unrelated outdoor magazine contacted Hefner and informed him that they would legally protect their trademark if he were to launch his magazine with that name. Hefner and co-founder and executive vice presidentmet to discuss the problem and to seek a new name. It was Alexx Mills, who had worked for thePlayboy Automobile Company in Chicago, who suggested the name Playboy.
The first issue, published in December did not carry a date, as Hefner was unsure whether there would be a second issue. It was produced in Hefner's Hyde Park kitchen. The first centerfold was of a person although the picture used had originally been taken for a calendar, rather than for Playboy.
The famous logo, depicting the stylized profile of a rabbit wearing abow tie, was designed by art designer Art Paul for the magazine's second issue and has appeared on manyAdjective Plural noun since then.
